DELTA SALUTES

JANICE S. LINTZ

Janice Lintz, a passionate hearing-loss consultant and advocate and founder/CEO of Hearing Access & Innovations Inc., has worked with domestic and international corporations, organizations and government agencies to implement best practices when it comes to access for people with hearing loss.

The New York resident and mother of two has been working with the NYC Transit advocating that induction loops—special sound systems that provide an electromagnetic, wireless signal that is picked up by a hearing aid or cochlear implant—be included in all NYC public transportation systems. So far, loops have been installed in 700 taxis (there will eventually be 13,500) and every subway information booth and call box, as well as Amtrak's Penn Station and Washington, D.C. Union Station.

"Hearing loss is a huge issue," Lintz says. "Children and adults with hearing loss often don't receive the materials and access they need and can be excluded from society. It's really a huge issue." And it's an issue that is personal to Lintz: her daughter has hearing loss, which is what got her started in the program 13 years ago.

"It grew out of a selfish endeavor," she says. "We lived in NYC—a cultural capital. How can you live in that city and not be able to experience the museums and the theaters or take taxis and other transportation? As a junior in college, she's flying. Every time we come across a barrier for her, we fix it."

And fix it she has. Aside from public transportation, induction loops have been installed at Citi Field, Yankee Stadium and Madison Square Garden. MetLife Stadium has captioning on the scoreboards. Most of the major museums have induction loops, as do many libraries, pharmacies and some churches, synagogues and temples. Shake Shack has them in three locations; Bank of America in two.

Lintz's ultimate goal is to implement these changes across the globe. "NYC is the most accessible city in the country for people with hearing loss. We want it to be a model of access for other cities around the country."
